Now, yeoman and patrician,
Weep for the great magician,
Whose clay now rests reject here
The music of those spheres
Which ever he drew out of to earthly years—
Weep, for he's dead and worthy of your tears!

What melodies have died out with him,
What million eyes have cried with him,
What million hearts have sighed with him,
Moved by his rare magician—
By the more than mere musician,
By the poet whose soul found speech
In the sublime seraphic touch
Of meeting our mortal reach
To those regions of his God its free!
To those regions high and higher,
Till it seem'd to us that only spirits inspire
All noble thought, all deeds heroic.
And the world was better because he lived in it;
Its genius made him its cherished boy
In the wood of Lida, while 'twas his to spin it,
He wove Love's golden thread
Which ever the heart's fancy
Alack that the woof is torn to a shred,
Alack that our good old friend is dead!

Through wonderful realms he led us,
On the banner of music he led us,
Till a subtle charm o'erpowered us,
And we grew half delirious with melody.
Half drunk with a rapture of ecstacy,
And the soul of the violin,
As it poured itself out, became
Now the wail of the lost in fire,
Now the trumpet-blare of fame;
It raged, it howled, it moaned,
It cried, it shrieked, it groaned,
Then fell to a single wave
Like the wail of the rare enchanter,
It turned to a solemn dirge
To the plaintive, pitiful song of a canter,
And in place of a dancing measure
The virtuoso, meerschaum-pipe at rest,
It laughed the silvery laugh of a child.
It gossiped like brooks in flowery wild,
It spoke Love's language unadorned,
And moved and sang like wanton Birds
In speech too dainty for spoken words,
And the notes, like some celestial balm,
Threw o'er the soul a restful calm,
Then seemed that all this marvelous riddle
Was solved at last by the master's fiddle!

Let his violin evermore rest
Inexorable and dumb,
For no mean world its wailings at best,
Till another shall come
The equal of him who so cherished and loved it—
Ape, let it be dumb, for the soul that once moved it.
That moved it to joy, or to sorrow's wan strip adage,
Would wail through the strings,
And a mind, as of wings,
Sad, rustling sound, would hover around
To dismal, discordant meanings!

It never the bleak Norwegian coast
Shall give us more,
Let this, then, be its future boast:
That from its shore
Came he nor whom the yeoman and patrician
Wept when he died—
Mighty of the great magician, wept for the rare mo-
And the man, beside!

PART THIRD—ALICE'S LOVER.

CHAPTER IV.—USELESS RESEARCHES.

Night still reigned when De Nancey and the sorrow-stricken Alice departed from the country villa wherein a ray of hope had momentarily the discovery of their elopement. At the moment of departure Alice cast a last look of door opening upon the excavated road, the fence she had stepped, the knoll upon the threshold, crossed by her for the last time, the wretched hut beside towards that habitation wherein had passed her pure and happy existence; she sent a final kiss to those who had gathered upon her path, those who had exhausted upon her a boundless affection, and who now were left behind!

"Farewell," she murmured, "farewell, farewell! Forgive me!"

Then she wept, her countenance inundated with tears, and decisively followed the Count, who, aware that Monsieur Lafene went daily to Frankfort by the early train, determined upon not neither taking the railway nor remaining in a town where so many memories of Mademoiselle de Mauban existed. He proceeded to a livery-stable, aroused groom and coachman, thrust thalers into the hands of all, ordered the horses put to the habitual German somnolence, and succeeded, after the lapse of an hour, in causing an equipage to be harnessed, and quitted the village, followed by the dust of the old post-chaise.

Four Leagues without pausing did the Count and Alice continue their journey, and then, only, did the duke deem it safe to relax the speed of his horses. The fugitives directed their course towards Brussels, and made a halt of two days in that city, in order to rest themselves after the insomnia as they carried away nothing, Alice not even wearing gloves, while upon her feet were only the embroidered slippers, used exclusively within doors. These purchases concluded, the Count and the young girl resumed their journey and entered France by the way of Quievrain and Blanc-Misseron.

We are now in the month of the very evening of the disastrous day of Alice's elopement, Monsieur Lafene having left for Paris in company with Lebel-Girard. Immediately upon arrival, he hastened to the mansion in the Rue de Bourgogne occupied by De Nancey, and, finding the people replied that their master, absent for several weeks, had given no notice of his approach, nor intimated that his visit was positively without intelligence concerning him. Doubting the veracity of the servants, Monsieur Lafene employed an irresistible talisman, never failing to unloosen the tongues of flunkies. He gave them golden coin, and, in the twinkling of an eye, received with benevolent condescension, the gold, of twenty-four hours' sojourn and investigation of the premises from cellar to garret. Thus was supplied incontestable evidence of the nonabsence of Monsieur.

Two paid commissionaires, relieving each other, were constantly upon the watch at De Nancey's dwelling. The one announcing the Count's arrival would receive for his vigilance a certain sum, and the other, dismissed, be conducted into the new-fangled policeman by this attractive prospect can be easily imagined. Monsieur Lafene experienced no repugnance in so doing, indeed, I am lost!"

Until during such a crisis, the Count should rejoin her, she gathered courage to smile, and thus to dissipate his affliction.

CHAPTER V.—A LULL.

Paul and Alice spent the entire Winter in this rustic dwelling, the former the object of a new new, upon the summit of an abrupt cliff. Fora pole distraction the young folks had eight, perpetually verdant, and internally novel, of the ocean, whose waves beat with the noise of a cataract the rocks of the spring-tide. Paul, who had unlearned not in contemplating, during the rage of storms, the massive struggle of the tempestuous ocean with the cliffs, which, since ages, for centuries had stemmed its inland approach.

The passed, days appeared to flow by, and Alice was not yet ready to be adored, with her gracious smile—saddened, it is true—arrayed in the picturesque costume of a Normandy peasant to please Paul. The Count himself was dressed, as amply almost as the fishers of the coast, in the garb of the term. His affectcapuchin hanging at the back, pantaloons of sheepskin, and sabots with little straw soles. This species of masquerading, far from debasing or vulgarizing, bestowed an expressive charm upon the countenance and person, and was ally distinctive and elegant.

As to morality, it was unrecognizable. In him could be detected but few traces of the last man, slightly uncouth, ever on the alert for violent emotions and perpetually ennuied. The social duke had disappeared, the libertine existed no longer. He believed himself ten years younger; he admired his beautiful, and put faith in the good. All sorts of benevolent instincts of generous sentiments, of which he supposed he had completely entertained no suspicion, were spontaneously generated in his soul. Love had accomplished this miracle.

Yes, Paul loved Alice; he adored her with the full power of his soul, with all the strength of his youth, with all the faith in an honest love. Was there at the risk of being charged as maintaining a paradox, we maintain the term. His affection for the charming girl in no wise resembled that unhealthy passion, that delirium in sensualism, he experienced in the presence of Blanche Lately. It was an affection of an absolutely different character—a burning devotion, and still almost on chaste. For Paul respected the young girl while adoring her. Blanche Lizzi while bearing his name had been more of a mistress than a wife. Alice resembled a wife more than a mistress. The pure and charming angel Marguerite merited a similar adoration. Had Paul not loved her, the happiness within his grasp would not have eluded him, in place of the anguish of the agony, of a foolish and criminal existence, he would have revelled in the joys of an honorable, legitimate union. Alice was a child, of which nothing can exist save moral debasement, shame and degradation.

Finally, unfortunately—as the days rolled away, a grave uneasiness obscured this bright spot in the cloudy sky of the young existence. Alice's countenance, pale and languishing, did not complain of physical suffering; still her whole bearing was detected by caresses. Paul consulted the physician of Roscoff—a man lacking neither knowledge nor intelligence—who, declaring that no vital principle had been attacked seriously, adjudged the case to be too strong for the young girl's delicate organization. Consequently, the Count arrived at a speedy determination. It appeared to him certain that Monsieur Lafene's researches to discover his niece would be long and difficult before. He resolved to quit Alice's retreat, and there conceal himself with her, in Paris, unless with an unoccupied dwelling in the environs of the capital. Lebel-Girard, devoted to public view, and to whom he had given a handsome treasure, undertook to effect, the requisite arrangements to be made. In the course of a few days, the Count and Alice would leave Roscoff for Paris, and there conceal themselves in the dwelling of Lebel-Girard, at Montmartre.

The young girl, in her turn, had experienced a long time before the presentiment of a misfortune. Her lover's departure, his absence with an unoccupied dwelling in the environs of the capital. Lebel-Girard, devoted to public view, and to whom he had given a handsome treasure, undertook to effect, the requisite arrangements to be made. In the course of a few days, the Count and Alice would leave Roscoff for Paris, and there conceal themselves in the dwelling of Lebel-Girard, at Montmartre.

J. G., Bridgeport.—There are two ways that a case can be formally placed in nomination for the Presidency—one is by a convention, or a number of men, and the other is by party or either. It is not to be supposed that the Democratic party will adopt the latter method of nominating them, as Grant, Blaine, Sherman and Bayard have been placed in nomination, as Garfield, Seymour, McClellan and others were last year. The next is to overcome the possible challenge that votes cast for a man who sold bonds can be thrown out, and believe the convention as a candidate, and this can be done by purchasing the claim of every one who has a claim against it. Necessarily, he is then formally put in the harness a man never was beaten. To put a candidate out is to decide who is and one who is not a candidate, and as the Democratic party of Hoboken (Garfield was the nominee of the Republican party of Hoboken) declined to nominate Grant by a three-fourth ballot, and as at Syracuse Hancock by a three-fourth ballot declined to vote for Grant, but a few days after formally placed in nomination, as he must can be so placed without his consent, with a majority of votes cast. The next is to overcome the possible challenge that votes cast for a man who sold bonds can be thrown out, and believe him

Boston vs. Buffalo	18	10	8	.555
Boston vs. Buffalo	19	10	9	.526
Boston vs. Buffalo	20	10	10	.500

On the 30th the Chicago and Worcester teams exhibited their series in Chicago, and the Troy and Cincinnati series is also printed, one of their games being indefinately postponed. The records are:

Contesting Clubs.	Played.	Won.	Lost.	Per Cent.
Troy vs. Cincinnati	1	1	0	1.000
Troy vs. Cincinnati	2	2	0	1.000
Troy vs. Cincinnati	3	3	0	1.000

Troy vs. Cincinnati	18	17	1	.944
Troy vs. Cincinnati	19	18	1	.947
Troy vs. Cincinnati	20	19	1	.950

Saturday's games caused no change in the standing of the clubs during the past four weeks tells a story that cannot be told in any other way. Providence and Worcester have changed places during the month, Troy, indeed, leads both Providence and Chicago by one game during August, as the appended table shows.

Club.	Won.	Lost.	Club.	Won.	Lost.
Troy	11	3	Worcester	5	9
Providence	11	3	Cleveland	6	9
Chicago	10	4	Cincinnati	4	10
Boston	7	7	Cincinnati	4	11

On Chicago's Saturday visit to Worcester their last three with Cincinnati, Providence shuts out Buffalo, Troy and Boston play a tie game, Cleveland fails to take its bats to the beat of the visitors' work at the club bat, and Cincinnati is unable to score a run in any game with the Eastern nines with Worcester opponents, and the Cincinnati nines with Cleveland as opponents, and the Cincinnati nines visit Buffalo, while the Providence team stop at home to receive Boston as the latter's first visit of the season.

	Providence.	Worcester.	Chicago.	Boston.	Troy.	Buffalo.	Cleveland.	Cincinnati.	Games Won.	Games Lost.	Per Cent.

Per Cent.	.500	.500	.500	.500	.500	.333	.307	.285

The contests between the East and the West now stands in favor of the latter, as will be seen by the following table:

	Providence.	Worcester.	Chicago.	Boston.	Troy.	Buffalo.	Cleveland.	Cincinnati.	Games Won.	Games Lost.	Per Cent.

The Polytechnic and Stars have a game to play, but the result will not change the relative position of the clubs. The record of each nine-game player in the tourney is as follows:

THE CLOSE OF THE TOURNEY.

National vs. Union.

The baseball tourney "for a set of silver"—not exhibited at Tiffany's—closed on Aug. 28, the Nationals winning the tourney between the Unions and Nationals, leaving the record of the six games played as follows:

	1	2	3	4	5	6	Total.
National	1	2	1	2	1	2	9
Union	0	1	2	1	0	1	5
Games lost	1	0	1	2	1	0	5

It will be but fair to say that last match, as the Unions made 14 errors, their average fielding would not have been up to that of their average playing for their opponents. In batting and fielding, however, the Nationals were fully up to their average, as they made but three six games. This speaks well for the pitching. The record of the players is as follows:

	Games.	Runs.	Errors.
Aug. 19, Rochester vs. Union	6	to 3	5
Aug. 20, Rochester vs. Union	7	" 5	3
Aug. 20, National vs. Union	8	" 4	3
Aug. 21, Rochester vs. Union	9	" 3	3
Aug. 24, National vs. Union	10	" 4	3
Aug. 24, National vs. Union	11	" 3	3
Aug. 28, National vs. Union	12	" 3	14

It will be seen that the last six matches were the Unions made 14 errors, their average fielding would not have been up to that of their average playing for their opponents. In batting and fielding, however, the Nationals were fully up to their average, as they made but three six games. This speaks well for the pitching. The record of the players played is as follows:

	Games.	Runs.	Errors.
Aug. 19, Rochester vs. Union	6	to 3	5
Aug. 20, Rochester vs. Union	7	" 5	3
Aug. 20, National vs. Union	8	" 4	3
Aug. 21, Rochester vs. Union	9	" 3	3
Aug. 24, National vs. Union	10	" 4	3
Aug. 24, National vs. Union	11	" 3	3
Aug. 28, National vs. Union	12	" 3	14

The Nationals and Stars have a game to play, but the Union team having a very bad "off-day"—teams have times like that occasionally—the Nationals, as the record of players have shown, have the Eagle Club of Rochester to defeat from Saturday's game, Schenck's four days was absent from centre-field, and Schenck's poor play there was not made more conspicuous by the fact that he was earned, and only three base-hits were made in the game, in which three runs were scored, the detailed description of a contest in the tourney. Morrissey, Mansell, Schenck and Hall batted heavily, and Berdell's hit was the only one charged to Hall. Morrissey, Mansell, Schenck and Hall batted heavily, and Berdell's hit was the only one charged to Hall. Lynch pitched a fine game, and but for his support would have won by a score of 5 to 0. PROVIDENCE vs. CLEVELAND.

The fourteenth and last championship game between the above-named clubs was played on the home grounds of the latter on Aug. 30, and resulted in one in the local team's favor blanked. The visitors were without a second base, while Houck was also absent from the field, and Sweasy, who had been released by the Providence management, was also absent. Both of these players, could do nothing with Bradley's pitching, making four assists and no chances for errors between them, and Shaffer was credited with three of them. The visitors, who batted with considerable vigor, were unable to take care of their seven safe hits in the six innings, when they scored five runs, assisted by errors of Dunlap, Radford and Glasscock.

In the games played in Brooklyn the Nationals defeated the Unions, and the Rochesters defeated the Unions three times, and the Rochesters defeated the Nationals in the game played on the home ground.

The contest of Saturday opened with some loose play by the Rochesters, Hall's muff of Bayne's fly, the new ball being a little livelier than that afterwards used, and the latter's passed ball, the latter, however, in support of the pitching was excellent, and as for the batting it was the best display of all of the contests, Bayne's home run, seconds, as fourteen of the eighteen base-hits made were either long or extra base hits. With the exception of one game, the series of contests in which the Nationals and Rochesters have been engaged part during fifteen days in August on the Union Grounds in Brooklyn, and part in the latter city, have been close for the past few years. The Saturday was exceptionally so, as the score will show, the Nationals batting well all through the exception of the of the last game—was fully up to the average of the Rochesters' fielding, and as for the pitching it was the best of the season. Now that the clubs have departed—the Nationals for Washington and the Rochesters for Rochester—the latter having a weekly play there and another in Baltimore—we propose to have a word or two to say about the season's work, and as strangers to it personally until we saw them play in Rochester, we can speak of their work from a fair standpoint in regard to the batteries. Baker and Derbyare a nine that can be relied upon to do good work in any position, the latter's work behind the bat, the former's in the box and at short-field, the curve change of pace, intelligent, exceptionally professional of the Spalding order, and the latter's batting and base-running, the former being the best of the two teams in batting, too. Baker is a good change pitcher, and has a fine command of the ball, and a capital man to have in a nine. On the bases Powell and Start are the best pair of first basemen Rochester has had on the ball at second base; while Hines has shown himself to be a fair player, he is not up to Joe, who is prone to talk too much, and to be slow in his movements, and Hankinson is a fair player at third, but his position are talkative. Mac did some good work at short, but was inclined to be careless, and was laid off the ball, Baker doing excellent service at short, and Daly pitching a good game when he was in the box, his play comes two or three times, but his fielding was not up to the average. Hall is a good man in the field, but one of the most promising of coming players is Keefe, a good batsman, and a fair fielder, he is by odds the speediest short-stopper, as also left-field player in these parts, and with practice will be a good all-round player. Hecker and Haven played well there. The outfielders were little tried, Mansell and Schenck in centre-field, and Purcell and Bayne in right, showing a very smart base-runner, he also field a good ball, and is a useful player. The veteran Mayerls attended to first base, Berdell to left, and Sutcliffe to right, the latter showing to advantage, he possesses to kicking; and no matter how he is placed he will be found a useful member of any team. The games were admirably umpired by Daily, Mr. Spalding's representative, and the batting and fielding figures of the two teams:

"For Life."

is the title of a four-act drama, adapted by Chas. F. Coghlan from "La Morte Civile," and first performed at the Grand Theatre, Leeds, Eng., Aug. 2. The plot is as follows:

Act I.—Scene opens on the commencement of the ball at Count Rosalba's. Daughter of a nobleman, Sandy Lisle, believed by and against the wishes of her parents to be married to Count Rosalba. Count Rosalba challenges Sandy's brother, Lieut. Lisle, to fight a duel. Lisle's sweetheart, Lucy Forrest, interferes and begs the duel may be postponed. Lisle consents. Lucy's friends, Count Rosalba and Sandy Lisle, are left alone. Count Rosalba tells the Lisle all that passes in the boudoir. The Count endeavors to compromise the lady, and Lucy enters her set into the world. In the meanwhile word is brought that Lisle has been killed in a duel. Lucy, in a fit of jealousy, in the presence of her friends, confesses the crime. Count Rosalba, with fiendish cunning, finds a confidant, who is a creature from his chosen and trusted friends, and by means of the church for a night's soother. This is Carmelo, the Abbe actively and remorselessly drugs from his reluctant lips the history of his crimes and his sins, and binds him up with the price of Agnes secure he will not be nearly loved child Lisle. The priest is certain, and this is Rosalba's husband, and he is determined to crimes at the present. He informs the unfortunate man of his penalty, at least the name of his wife, and he is left by their mate to be conducted. His convict lost meets his wife, and he is informed that she is married to Rosalba, and that she is about to be married to Rosalba. INTRODUCTORY.

MONDAY, August 30, '80.

The opening days of last week were very trying to theatrical managers, for those who were tempted by the late cool spell to throw open their doors and commence the season's campaign of amusement terribly taken in and sadly disappointed; for another wave, all hot and smoking, struck us amidships, and knocked us completely off our feet.

Of course, the heated wave pounced down upon us on the previous Saturday, took firm hold on Sunday, permeated the entire eastern circuit on Monday, and in many particulars has not let go us up to Wednesday, when the heated term culminated in a grand thunderstorm, which cooled down the air to a degree that on Monday were caught in the sirocco, and the habitues were driven to the mountains. The approaching wave had been given due notice of, but the managers, as usual, were, otherwise, postponements and the improvements would have been in order, and the managers and stars would have been off on their vacations, and the public would have been spared their premature opening. On the other hand, the managers, who had been in the same disastrous effect as it has on the Broadway beau and belle, who had opened an engagement on Monday night in the Bowery slope there was an avalanche of ice, and those were left to die of a rush of many waiters. "What is that?" asked a gentlemen who was a writer on a morning paper, standing at the gates." "It is the wind, sir" (Windsor), was our quick reply. "Oh, I see," was the reply, and we could like to ask the unbiased reader if he considers it its fair that we should be compelled to endure the fatigue of a sideshow a wind-instrument. Yet we heard this cruel remark made on the first night of the season, and it is surprising that the hard-working blower should come down from his elevated position, and, with the throat, "Princess of Trebizonde" at Leipsic. ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

With a view of relieving the pressure upon our regular "Answers to Correspondents" column, we propose to insert, in this department, answers to such of the correspondents' cards queries as relate to other matters will be answered in our regular columns, and also to such of the correspondents' notes or papers from those asking for information concerning engagements. No answers will be given to such queries by mail or telegraph, to any question that we may have omitted to notice, unless inclosed with a stamped envelope. All such will be answered publicly, through our columns.—ED. CLIPPER.]

NB—QUESTIONS THAT DO NOT REACH THE OFFICE UNTIL THURSDAY MORNING WILL NOT BE ANSWERED UNTIL THE FOLLOWING WEEK.

To Our Authorized Correspondents.

In the future please give all routes based on combinations upon alphabetic system of arrangement, as given in your letters.

J. L. J.—Durham.—The duties of a stage-manager are so multifarious that we cannot specify the space to which they extend. Any one who is competent to discharge the duties of the position unless he has either had a long experience as a stage-manager or has graduated in the career as an actor has closely watched the work of the stage-manager.

R. M., Philadelphia.—It was answered in this column, as to which of which a card was published. It will not answer by mail or telegraph. A further rule is that we must decline to give the addresses of professionals, as we have been under the head of City Summary, you will see that Arthur Lee is to be with Lotta's company the coming season.

COURTY.—1. The born and troubles are distinct instruments. Your inquiry is indefinite. 2. Consult a physician. 3. Your letter is illegible. 4. We do not know.

C. R. L., Joseph.—O. T. Brooks did not introduce "The Corsican Brothers" to this country. It was first produced in America on Oct. 31, 1868, at the Academy of Music, Chicago, Edward Eddy playing the parts that Brooks afterward acted at the London Lyceum.

R. J. W., Grand Rapids.—1. John McCullough was born in Ireland. 2. He made his first appearance on the stage in Albany before he went on the stage. He was employed in a Philadelphia gas-manufactory. 3. Mr. Sothern is not in New York.

J. H. S., Boston.—Until the season opened, James Wallack, Jr., was with Lotta's company. Since then he has been with Mrs. Scott-Siddons.

G. F. S., Danville Forks.—When we say here in that role, we were not sufficiently observing to justify our attempting to describe all the changes. It is sufficient to state that she never played it exactly the same way two nights alike throughout.

S. H. S., Houston.—John Brougham being dead, the likeliest place to find—if he is not employed in Houston, Texas, is where you are. All we can say is that we have no intention of his being dead as long as we can help it.

W. M. Z., Arcola.—We have just received notification from the manager that the new combination of the Boston Museum Standard Dramatic and Novelty Combination will open the season at the Boston Museum.

New Utah, Fremont.—1. Address him in care of THE CLIPPER office. 2. We do not know. 3. Probably not. It is his privilege to make it known in advance, and a note to us might elicit an answer.

J. L., Milwaukee.—His name appears as author and composer of the song, but he is not the player. He only composed the music. He bought the words of one man, and the music of another.

Over P., Halifax.—We do not make such recommendations, and we are sorry to be compelled to refuse. Your best course is to either advertise or to apply to some dramatic agency.

SUBSCRIBER, Waverly.—It is impossible for us we are asked to decide a bet, that we should know exactly what the bet is. Please inclose the paper, and state the bet, and we will see the name.

Y. L. B., Columbus.—We know of no exclusively theatrical paper at present published in Boston. There is an amusing theatrical paper, published here three or four months.

P. C. AND P. C., Boston.—1. Either advertise or apply to some manager of a variety theatre. 2. There is no recognized champion clog-dancer of the world.

R. R., Chicago.—Miss Linda Webster is the wife of J. Hamilton Hall, who is not now on the stage. She retired during the summer they were in Europe.

C. C., Cincinnati.—Address him at the office of this paper. See the CLIPPER for his address. Subscribe for it, and you will find it the best theatrical journal, and would occupy more space than we can spare.

PLEASE, Elsewhere.—State the bet.

E. C. K.—2. Teachers of that specialty advertise in The Clipper. There is no such person as Mlle. Mitchell.

N. M. Toronto.—Mlle. Mitchell is a sister of Maggie. She is not on the stage. She is not now. She is in the world. Write to her.

W. C. Chicago.—If you cannot find her name mentioned in The Clipper's Directory column, address her at the CLIPPER post-office.

C. C. Cincinnati.—We cannot say. Any information of this kind in our possession would appear in our columns.

E. J. S.—We have not the address. As per request, an item appeared in The Clipper would probably elicit it.

T. C. D. Boston.—Address Mrs. Frank Leslie, 53 West 10th street, New York. She is the widow of the late gentleman who was for many years the publisher of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.

Subscriber, Cincinnati.—Address either of the above professionals, more especially ladies.

J. M. M. Augusta.—Yes, he was from Georgia. 2. He was not in or near Savannah at the time.

INTRODUCTORY.

MONDAY, August 30, '80.

The opening days of last week were very trying to theatrical managers, for those who were tempted by the late cool spell to throw open their doors and commence the season's campaign of amusement terribly taken in and sadly disappointed; for another wave, all hot and smoking, struck us amidships, and knocked us completely off our feet.

Of course, the heated wave pounced down upon us on the previous Saturday, took firm hold on Sunday, permeated the entire eastern circuit on Monday, and in many particulars has not let go us up to Wednesday, when the heated term culminated in a grand thunderstorm, which cooled down the air to a degree that on Monday were caught in the sirocco, and the habitues were driven to the mountains. The approaching wave had been given due notice of, but the managers, as usual, were, otherwise, postponements and the improvements would have been in order, and the managers and stars would have been off on their vacations, and the public would have been spared their premature opening. On the other hand, the managers, who had been in the same disastrous effect as it has on the Broadway beau and belle, who had opened an engagement on Monday night in the Bowery slope there was an avalanche of ice, and those were left to die of a rush of many waiters. "What is that?" asked a gentlemen who was a writer on a morning paper, standing at the gates." "It is the wind, sir" (Windsor), was our quick reply. "Oh, I see," was the reply, and we could like to ask the unbiased reader if he considers it its fair that we should be compelled to endure the fatigue of a sideshow a wind-instrument. Yet we heard this cruel remark made on the first night of the season, and it is surprising that the hard-working blower should come down from his elevated position, and, with the throat, "Princess of Trebizonde" at Leipsic. Signor Rizzo, Mme. Zealpoff has been making the piano eloquent in Lisbon. Mme. Rosa Csillag has returned to Vienna. Mme. Essipoff has been making the piano eloquent in Lisbon. Booth, and insisted upon opening as a star, but offering to play Hamlet for a week, Irving to sustain the rest of the English actor, who preferred to make a provincial tour, and will begin in October next, and continue for about three months. Mr. Irving's manager says that "Princess" that he is pleased to an elephant for the Zoological Gardens, London. Mr. Irving has to do with Booth without injuring Booth's prospects in this country. Mr. Irving's manager says that he has engaged Miss Ellen Terry, the leading lady of the management of the Princess's Theatre, London, to come to America, and star in the new version of "Olivia," which Mr. Irving has had made for her. Miss Terry is the wife of Charles Kelly, the well-known actor.

RHYMES

They had pictures of "Pan on the Britch,"
For Punch was the name of the crystal;
And the manager roared,
"Take away that record!"
To take part in "Pan on the Bran-tub."

Punch and Judy, the representatives of the Dutch have not taken Holland. Instead of going over to the Netherlands with their show, they have gone to Java. It was his province to appear in a neighboring province. Punch and Judy, in their foreign engagements, seems to have added commercial pursuits to their theatrical ones. Punch has become a dealer in the well-known "Salford's Sauce" in his legitimate dishes, combining the drama with the sauce, thereby securing favor to the same. Another processions is doing the "Liver-pool" feature, and very soon we may look for the "Sauce-pan" and "Frying-pan" features. The "Clam-schower Aggregation," "Boston Bean Alphabet," "Lobster Quadrille," and "Codfish Ballet" we don't know where the thing is to end. Last week Punch and Judy were at the Bowery Theatre, commencing each verse with the refrain:

"Punch and Judy, the representatives of the Dutch are not corn!"

And they carried a kettle of corn with them, and managed to get rid of a great deal of corn-cake and cheese, and might have done well if a smack-thief hadn't stolen the show. Punch and Judy give car hadn't stolen the show. Punch and Judy give car hadn't stolen the show. Punch and Judy give car

THE OPENING OF THE SEASON IN BOSTON, MASS., is thus reviewed by our correspondent, who wrote Aug. 30: "The dramatic season may be said to have commenced Aug. 23, two of our theatres opening on that date and the New Boston Museum 26. The latter establishment has been entirely rebuilt, and all have undergone thorough renovation and embellishment, and promising for what promises to be the liveliest season ever witnessed in this city. Manager Sanderson, of the Museum, it is kept in such good condition that the re-assessment cannot be very large. The stage has been enlarged and improved, while from the inner doors has been newly laid and the seats have been reupholstered in crimson plush. The boxes and balcony rails have been painted with straw-color and gold, and the whole place presents a most cheerful appearance. The curtains have been painted by Albert Habercroth. The ticket offices occupy the old position, but the entrance to the parquette, provided by nickel-plated rails. New carpetings have been laid throughout the house, and the parquette circle has been cleaned, the stairs and the gas-entrance and decorations have been renewed, and a new gas-fixture has been erected over the Mason street entrance. The new curtain is a novelty. It represents a view of Scarborough, Eng., and is painted by Mr. Habercroth. The scene is a beautiful one, and is well painted, though the waves of the water look somewhat like cotton batting. The curtain is edged by the initials of Charles Claycraft, and the baby wearing the best dressed parts in the play, Francis Cleveland Wyatt, Jr. The cast of Mr. Herne was a capital character-scrumption, hearty, good-natured and humorous, and really a part in the play. Another scene of the last acts. Frank E. Aiken, although left-handed, played the character well. He came in the interview with his daughter in the churchyard, and gained enthusiastic applause. Miss Mordaunt was a lovely sweetheart as Chrystal, but her earnestness was not always appreciated. Miss Wyatt's Phebe Tarr was rendered in one of the most pleasing manners. The little woman is a born actress, and we must confess a liking for it. She is the only child we have seen that interested us. Nevertheless, albeit the comic element is not sufficiently prominent, though the characters of Gen. Gansevoort and Daryl's part supply this deficiency. As given here, the greatest strength is attached to the character of the Yankee, which in all respects surpasses anything before seen at this theatre. The first act represents the coast of Marblehead, with the surf rolling upon the beach; the interior of a cottage, with appropriate furniture, being the most realistic witnessed, the rain falling so copiously that the unfortunate leaves of a fern were not too protected. They were in twice or thrice removed each several times. The last scene, a view of the Lynn Woods, is also well painted, but the trees look too much like cotton batting. The cast is as follows: Capt. Ephraim Kenyon, Sen., Frederick Bryton; Capt. Ephraim Kenyon, Jr., Frank Mordaunt; Gen. Nicholas Gansevoort, Frank Aiken; Hiram Strickland, Joseph Wheelock, Jr.; Rev. Dr. Byram; assistant treasurer, G. W. Floyd; musical director, Mr. Habercroth; scenic artist, A. H. Habercroth; machinist, J. D. Landy; gas engineer, George Reed; property-man, Mr. Howard Ryan; chief usher, Richard Donnelly; doorkeeper, J. F. Vila; programmer, Robert Johnson; ticket-seller, Thomas Cronin. LIFE'S CROSSES.

WRITTEN FOR THE NEW YORK CLIPPER, BY VANDYKE BROWN.

He was old and weak and shabbily dressed,
The tide-beaten street of a man,
Whose story the passer-by might have guessed,
If the face he had stooped to scan;
For Fate had dealt him many a blow
Now sparingly and now from behind,
With sickness and poverty laying him low,
Thus cruelly making him blind.

As I dropped a pittance into his hat
I said, for I longed to know
But he cheerily answered: "Yes, it is that,
For I'm blind and poor, and have suffered
From all that grows to life its joy—
Yet perhaps it is only my share;
For the cane was never yet born, my boy,
Who hadn't his cross to bear."

I walked through a famous uptown square,
And I envied the rich man's ease,
But lo! on the silver door-bell there
A cross fastened out on the fence.
Ah, this, I reflected, is golly's alley,
And I muttered to myself in air:
"The man was never yet born, my boy,
Who hadn't his cross to bear."

I heard the plaudits and laughter ring
As the theatre packed to the walls,
Where the rich man's wife was tragically sing,
While the poor man's wife was in labor;
Yet I knew in her hurried throes of joy
Of a life with his dead child to share,
"The man was never yet born, my boy,
Who hadn't his cross to bear!"

I thought of a poet who labored long
In anguish and want, alone,
Till he struck the highest wings of song
That delight which few have known;
Then fell the blight of disease to destroy
The power he had won in despair—
"The man was never yet born, my boy,
Who hadn't his cross to bear!"

I thought of a Judge who was honored of men
For the power and place he had won,
Yet the pitiful one, day, in the prisoner's pen,
Was the Judge's only son.
And from how the Judge's face could employ,
As also the father was crushed in despair—
"The man was never yet born, my boy,
Who hadn't his cross to bear!"

And thinking of this—how wealth and fame
And honor and power and all
May each have the grief or the pain or the shame,
I would not choose but recall
The words which the beggar blind could employ,
In his cheery philosophy rare:
"The man was never yet born, my boy,
Who hadn't his cross to bear!"

PART THIRD—ALICE'S LOVER.

CHAPTER IX.—CONTINUED.

That very evening, leaving Blanche solitary inhabitant of the furnished house occupied by them since morning, he placed in his pocket a bundle of bankbills and presented himself at the gaming-table. It was a moment of emotion when, upon entering the "Salon Privé," he found himself confronted by a throng of young men, with whom, at Paris, but few months before, he had associated in the most go-lucky manner upon the boulevards or in the green-room of the Opera. But he was bold and decisive. Should the Parisians fail to recognize him, then his transformation was complete. Instantly modifying the habitual air of his carriage, assuming a dignified demeanor, cold and accentless laughter, and coldness a haughty conservative to the minutest details of his private life, he continued his walk. The young men gazed at him in curiosity, as he brushed against their little group. Doubtless they would speak to him. He slackened his pace and listened.

"Who is he?" inquired one of them.

"An Englishman beyond doubt," was the reply.

"It is the first time I have seen him, nevertheless it seems to me the face is familiar to me. Yes, to be sure, there is a resemblance——"

"To whom?"

"To the Prince Gregory S—— Do you not think so?"

"Heavens! yes. Still—in any case, should the resemblance exist, it is very vague, and not at all striking."

Gregory and heard enough to assure him that his new metamorphosis would not be readily detected.

He proceeded straightway to the table of trente-et-quarante, placed a thousand-franc bill on the Red, won, made it double three times in succession, and retired his money at the precise moment when the Black commenced to emerge. An hour subsequently he rejoined Blanche, carrying with him gains to the amount of fifty-five or sixty thousand francs.

"See!" said he to the Creole, displaying rouleaux of gold and bankbills upon the little table near which she was reading by the light of a couple of wax candles. "Have I wasted my time this evening?"

"It is, then," she murmured with bitterness, "for money that you desert me! Ah! Gregory!"

The Wallachian did not reply, but counted his winnings.

"And, moreover," continued Blanche, "on what use can this money be? Are we not rich? Heaven be praised, no need for it. You are rich."

"Have we ever enough?"

"Yes, certainly; yon at least—you, Gregory, who know not the amount of your fortune. If you will yourself who told me so——"

"Doubtless; still circumstances may present themselves in the near application. If, for instance, the French tribunals should pronounce condemnation against me nothing would prevent obtaining from the Hospodar a full restitution of my domains in Wallachia. Then I would find myself absolutely without resources."

"Never! say, admitting even such a calamity should come to pass, there remains to you what I possess."

Gregory made a stately gesture.

"And you have no right to refuse this fortune," continued the Countess, with animation. "I will be your wife—you have sworn it—and the wife's property is that of the husband. Moreover, is not my body enriched through gaming? What is won to-day is lost on the morrow. Despise such money, Gregory, and do not leave me longer! Oh! quit me not! When you are not with me, believe me, I am hourly stricken. To feel that I deserted all! My life is interwoven with yours, Gregory!"

Blanche arose. She encircled Gregory's neck with her arms, and resumed:

"Gregory, remember! You spoke to me one day, and your inspiring words I have forever graven in my memory and upon my heart. Oh! remember, you said to me: 'Ambition is the fall of the feebles, fringe of ambition, supremacy in power?' There is but one thing here below which is real, which is great, and which converts man into a god; it is love.' Thus thought you then. Hast thou forgotten? Gregory, I adore you, and I confess it unreservedly! Remember! remember thyself!"

The blonde siren was irresistible, and the Wallachian that night promised everything her jealousy exacted of him. This, however, did not prevent his return on the morrow to the Conversation Saloon, there to gain, as on the previous day, a round sum of money. What could be suspected? He unanimously doled upon that enormous coin, those alluring banknotes, heartily despised by the Countess, and voluntarily he repeated, with the modification of a single word, that rhetorical sentence Blanche treasured at heart: "There is but one thing here below which is real, which is great, and which converts a man into a god; it is money!"

Gregory's streak of luck continued. Soon the German newspapers and French correspondents daily entertained the public with gossip relative to the miraculous success of the Right Honorable Baronet Sir John Snalsby of Snalsby House, a cove royale, whose every pleasure inspired croupiers with a wholesome dread.

And while the Wallachian, in fullness of happiness, pocketed the bank's golden wealth, Blanche, in her commonplace solitude, wept in anger and in grief. She felt herself disdained.

She, the impassioned woman, haughty and self-ish, prepared for absolute devotion as for implacable vengeance! She, the rival of Mistress Peabody predominated within the heart of Gregory over fidelity to her peerless beauty! To her voice, murmuring accents of love, he preferred the croupier's stentorian tones, endlessly repeating:

"Make your game, gentlemen! Nothing goes further! The Rod passes—the odd wins!"

She was filled with bitterness. Still she would shortly suffer still more grievously; for the expiation was commencing, and it must attain an altitude in which the fall should be such she had done, which she was still about to do.

Heaven is just!

CHAPTER X.

MADEMOISELLE MAXIMUM AND THE EMERALD FAIRY.

At that moment could be found in Baden two Parisians of the highest rank and fortune whose movements engrossed the attention of reporters for society journals. Both were decidedly handsome. The first had filled one and many parts in one of the Parisian variety theatres at a time when the hair classed her among the brunettes. Since then she had become an auburn, doubtless discovering that black eyes better suit fall-colored hair. Several costly emeralds and royal intimacies had almost rendered her a celebrity. She gambled often and played high. She had, in the latter days, gained large sums; subsequently, upon the disappearance of luck, that coming from trente-et-quarante melted away in roulette.

The second Parisian could, with better reason, pose for a celebrity, and had long associated her pretensions, demonstrating that labor and an energetic will create out of a charming woman; who was lacking in beauty, a dazzling woman, a comedian of real talent. Naturally she had been a queen of fashion, had created

VESPER BOAT CLUB REGATTA.

To use the language of a Celtic gentleman regarding St. Patrick, Lovell Swan, Esq., has started with fruit "the Vesper regatta is a bigger man than the fourth of July." Last year, 1879, it figured as great an event as Independence-day, and it would seem as though the interest increased instead of fell off. Wednesday, Sept. 8, the Vespers' annual regatta occurred, and was a success in every particular. The first race was started promptly at 2.30. Tots for single scull race, and five entries—P. F. Cody, W. D. Gilet, C. H. Rose, J. A. Smith and J. W. Wells. It was a spirited race, and was won by Cage. In 1m. 40s. Rose second in 1m. 50s.; Rose, second, 1m. 35s.; Wells, third, 1m. 40s. The next race was for single silver medal. The second race was for double-scull work-ing-boats in pairs of two oars, silver medal and a good race. The entries were John Walsh and E. S. Schurman, and D. O. Goddard and W. A. Sherman. The sherman boys won handily in the face of the race, a sliding-door falling over board of Lovell, went over the course, which was occasioned some surprise and many doubts, but the race was finished in 4m. 42s., less a half second ahead. The third race was for single-scull, for canal-boatmen's medal, silver medal and J. W. Wells. It was a spirited race, and was won by Cage. In 1m. 40s. Rose second in 1m. 50s.; Rose, second, 1m. 35s.; Wells, third, 1m. 40s. The next race was for double-scull working-boats in pairs of two oars, silver medal and a good race. ONLY A FLOWER.

WRITTEN FOR THE NEW YORK CLIPPER.
BY WILLIE CARTER.

Only a flower
Faded and crushed,
That brings to me fond memories of days of long ago.
A loving tree
It reach now bended;
She plucked it near the bending tree, the timpid violets
A blissful dream,
A sweet love theme,
This little leaf recalls to mind my childhood's days gone
A happy hour
We did play
Beneath the overhanging plain where Summer winds do
Only a flower
Turning to rue,
This withered leaf now accustom a story tells to me—
Of love and trust;
Of love and trust;
The little maid who plucked it not sleeping 'neath the
Those hours of joy
Can I forget
Her dimpled chin and pretty face once graba this token?
Have I regret.
And cast away with this memento vows that have been

THE TRAGEDY IN THE RUE BOURSAULT:

A MYSTERY WHICH PARIS DETECTIVES NEVER SOLVED.

WRITTEN FOR THE NEW YORK CLIPPER.
BY NICHOLAS NILES.

This was what Paris awoke to on a certain Sunday morning, expressing passing wonder as it stopped to coffee:

A murder. In that by itself there was nothing to particularly excite the gossip of the capital's cafes. But a murder most mysterious—a double murder—and one of the victims a pretty young girl of scarce half the town had gone mad. These were pourcoi conconiantans to a plain every-day dish of crime. But than this—the murder in the Rue Bourseult, re ried with it, besides mystery, and perhaps be cau there a little sincere grief, widespread and peopl sat disappointment. Now, disappointment is some thing with the Parisian which cannot be said of no one concernedly as he does mystery, or a tenth part so philosophically as he does disappointment.

For two weeks back a complimentary benefit had been announced at the Hippodrome. The event had declared favorably by half. The nobility of Paris to the sublimely beautiful creature whom the play- bills declared as the star of the evening was the queen of the arena. Whether the noble gentlemen whose names appended to the common announcement pages had anything to do with the affair may be doubted. But this is certain, that every night the Hippodrom was packed to suffocation with crowds eager to see the beautiful Eloise; for a month past she had been the talk of the town; for a fortnight Eloise was discussed wherever there change of talk in the cafes of the Latin Quarter, and at Vincennes. The starting belles of the demi-monde indulged in while the Parisian gentleman had at no one concernedly as he does mystery, or a tenth part so philosophically as he does disappointment.

For two weeks back a complimentary benefit had been announced at the Hippodrome. The event was declared favorably by half. The nobility of Paris to the sublimely beautiful creature whom the play- bills declared as the star of the evening was the queen of the arena. Whether the noble gentlemen whose names appended to the common announcement pages had anything to do with the affair may be doubted. But this is certain, that every night the Hippodrom was packed to suffocation with crowds eager to see the beautiful Eloise; for a month past she had been the talk of the town; for a fortnight Eloise was discussed wherever there change of talk in the cafes of the Latin Quarter, and at Vincennes. The starting belles of the demi-monde indulged in while the Parisian gentleman had at Germaine quarter spoke spitefully of her—if they were well-born. She had come to Paris a stranger at that, and she was only a circus-rider! Not to know her, and not to be willing to pay a good round five francs for a card to her benefit, was to confess one's self out of the ton. And, as for the common being, who had become the idol of Paris for a day, on the night of the benefit the house was packed to the very night preceding the important event: of her complimentary benefit.

So much was everybody for news of the affair that the modest house in the Rue Bourseult, where the fair equestrienne had her apartments, was surrounded with an excited crowd, who declared and enlarged upon the meagre facts reported every morsel of information dropped by the police or neighbors. Throughout the day and night before this crowd lingered in the neighborhood, now and then rushing in a handful, now swelling to a torrent ambition. On every hand was the expression of deepest regret over the tragedy, and threats against those which might have caused it. But—

Who was that wretch?

The keenest of the Parisian detectives never found a solution to that blood-stained enigma. And yet truth was at last unearthed, as truth always is.

Mlle. Eloise could certainly lay claim to the royalty of the equestrian circle, and as certainly she was a queen of American—whether the belle of that vast country the writer will not say.

But she was a wonderful rider, and she was a wonderfully pretty woman. Indeed, that hit she made in Paris might have turned her head but for one thing. First, she was not a conceited, nor a vicious woman of thirty, who had won triumphs in her art and before scores of admiring spectators, but among impetuous young Paris, were born; second, she was attended by her father, and the devotion to his child was almost pathetic in its intensity.

Whatsoever a man's character the love of child turned at some earlier day in the bosom of Eloise Harding, his mistress for the time love was now sacred to her father alone. Naturally, with such a combination of beauty, her easier romantic manner, and her father's devotion, Eloise Harding's life was a great many love-episodes in the past; but as every bookkeeper knows, there are a few names or flowers to send her, and every maid and powdered old rogue who habitues the pit and gallery per at the Cafe Paris upon her, came in good time to know, no matter how many admirers the fair and beautiful American ever forget the simple rules of virtue in she had ever set for herself, and always followed. During her brilliant Paris engagement, and at the end of four of her death, she might have counted lovers by the score—all ready to lay down their art and her father. With her traveling-ots horse wee art. But she was not one to be carried away by the trashing of the muscles, or the trick of maintaining equilibrium. It was not by her skill as a rider alone may confer. It was never coarse, never came or coarse, and in that she was the envy of other women do ever since you began going to the circus, and the theme of the hour among those about the paper-covered balloons and buried her body through a drum the circumference of which was bounded with glistening spangles. By the way, the hats were common enough, by the by, Mlle. Eloise did seem to be different. She was in all equestrienne that have been or shall be, what an Eloise is to cinema.

Who murdered Mlle. Eloise?

As the end of twenty-four hours the police had possessed themselves of these facts: Shortly before midnight of Saturday, the night of the day on which the Rue Bourseult were startled by a shriek which came from apartments of Eloise Harding. These apartments were on the third floor, and consisted of four connecting rooms. The first was a drawing-room; the next, lighted by a side-window, was smaller, and was furnished as a reading-room; the third was Mlle. Eloise's sleeping-apartment; and the fourth, which contained a bath, was occupied by Clark, as a dressing-room for the latter. Except that last, these rooms were in a line, lighted by windows in the front and rear of the house, and connected one with another by double doors. Mlle. Harding's sleeping-apartment, which was also the bath-room, led out into the drawing-room at right angles to the same suite. Mlle. Eloise and her father had occupied these pleasant and luxuriously furnished rooms for a fixed period, their sojourn in Paris ceasing for no definite reason, and being governed by pecuniary considerations. At the time of the tragedy they had occupied the rooms for somewhat more than a month. Mlle. Eloise had been accustomed to prolong her engagement six weeks beyond the original limit. Although Mlle. Eloise and her daughter spoke French fairly, they received very few visitors, except now and then members of the Hippodrom company. The concierge recalled that on that dreadful Saturday night a gentleman who had two or three times visited the Hardings before, and who was known as Monsieur Jules —apparently an American—rang the bell, and was shown to Mlle. Eloise's apartments. He did not seem to have gone out during the evening; but it was plain, to the mind of the concierge at least, that he must have been in some in some manner, since, when the other occupants of the house rushed in to the Hardings' apartments in response to the piercing shriek, nothing was to be found of the visitor. Except the concierge, nobody had seen this mysterious caller. He was not a member of the Hippodrom company, and he came, either on the night of the tragedy or upon the occasion of a previous visit, by the rear. As the concierge excitedly declared, he was a foreigner and an American, it seemed only fair to accept that description. Furnished them the police were unable to arrest anybody whom the concierge could identify as the man. According to the latter's story, which he repeated over and over again, without a change in the smallest detail, the last serious visitor, who was described as a young man, tall and slender, with a pale face, turbulent eyes, always shielded by spectacles, a thin moustache, and the merest growth of beard on his chin, believe caterists invariably append to Uncle Jonathan's chin—this young man came to the house about nine o'clock in the evening, and was shown to Mlle. Eloise's drawing-room, where both that lady and her father were seated; that he remained until he relieved from appearing in the scene that night, on account of the presence of the concierge, who was, where as the concierge saw, he was greeted most cordially and spoken to familiarly by Mlle. Eloise. From that time on, nothing occurred to attract attention to the house or its occupants until the piercing shriek already mentioned; the concierge was the first to reach the apartments, for having just retired, he rushed into the drawing-room, the door of which, opening into the hall, was slightly ajar; he found the room lighted as usual, and without the slightest disturbance the horrible sight that there awaited him—the sight of Mlle. Eloise lying dead on the carpet, with the blood flowing in a stream from a terrible bullet-wound in her left temple, and the rigid figure of Mlle. Eloise stretched on a satin-covered sofa, which also was that of a woman. Could Mlle. Eloise have been alive when the concierge started for the third floor, and dead when he reached the drawing-room? The interval was not more than three minutes! The physicians thought not; so did the police. Yet few minutes later, when a doctor arrived the equestrienne was surely dead. The physicians agreed on that point. Not Eloise's voice which had uttered the shriek. The laughed at the suggestion that it was the mysterious caller by the name of Jules. But the concierge and every other stuck to his story. The hearing of all to the contrary only strengthened the fact that, although the shriek of a woman's voice was distinctly heard, no voice but the dead girl's had been the report of the pistol which must have been discharged to produce the death of the father.

Paris does not permit itself to be long amazed over any one event. Ever since the police had wearily hunted down every possible clue without shedding a ray of light on the mystery, the crime passed into the category of unfathomed tragedies. In a month previously Jean Rapp, the old porter of the Jardine Maddite murdered her noble lover, and that turned the drift of public interest.

When the concierge was asserted that on the night of the tragedy in the house in the Rue Bourseult a young man called upon Mlle. Eloise, he told only the truth. This young man, who answered perfectly the description given by the concierge, actually received at he entered the apartments of the household equestrienne.

"You ought to be scolded, Josi," exclaimed Eloise, extending her hand to the visitor.

"Jor coming to late! You and papa will get to talking about your abominable chemicals and drugs, as you always do, and I shan't be able to get in a word."

The young man laughed good-naturedly, and helped himself to a seat with the ladies present.

"Well, my queen of the sawdust circle, if I come late, you know I always say last. To-night I shall have something to say to you about our favorite drugs, as you call them; but you may put on all the words you please, and they will be accorded that grave consideration which any utterance of yours deserves."

Alexander Harding, although reared to the profession in which his daughter had won such substantial triumph, had retired from the ring fully twenty years before. He had amassed a competency which enabled him to devote the declining years of his life to experimental chimistry. On the latter he had developed an absorbing passion. It was in pursuit of his favorite occupation that some years before, while living in New York, he had become acquainted with Joseph Clark, a young analytical chemist. He was a man of strong friendship, which had come also to be shared by Eloise. And grown up, Clark had become a favored visitor—one to be, a the better to prosecute his studies; and he had been a resident of the city a year or more when he was summoned to Europe to fulfill her engagement at the Hippodrom. Of course, the intimacy between Harding and Clark was renewed on this occasion; and while the concierge was right in his statement that the latter visited at the house only three or four times, could he such evidence have been adduced, it would which have known the whereabouts of one Eloise's father would be seen able to testify to the fact that the latter had spent two-thirds of the time during his sojourn in Paris with the mysterious "Jules."

For an first hour after his arrival, that Saturday evening, the conversation turned chiefly on the subject of the professor's favorite. Then it took the fact which the fair equestrienne had predicted—it became to savor of chloride and chemicals. The two scientists had found the topic of absorbing interest to them, and with a pretty pout Eloise withdrew to her own apartments.

"Have you made any progress," inquired Clark, "in your hypnotic experiments, professor?"

"I have, indeed," answered the old man proudly. "I believe I have discovered the key to the secret of a new element. Step into my den, here—I want to show you my latest."

Alexander Harding led his friend into the bath-room, where he had fitted up a sort of laboratory for his experiments. Then it took the fascination of science, the two men remained until interrupted by the shriek of Mlle. Eloise.

"Are you conscious of the deadly, sad, sick feeling which comes to the victim of the opium habit?" asked Dr. Ludlow, as he sat by the bedside of a friend who was suffering from the effects of a debauch.

"Yes, I am conscious of it," was the reply, "and I am sorry to say that I have experienced it more than two hundred times."

"Possible!" exclaimed her father apologetically. "How time flies! You see, my dear, I have been so engrossed in my studies in preparing cyanogen, the old-fashioned way of heating mercury cyanide—"

"My dearest father," interrupted Eloise, "what in the world has cyanogen to do with the subject of making cyanogen? You have had enough of that, and I am sure Josi has had enough of your letter and sweet, and for the next half hour the subject of cyanogen must be tabooed. Now, for dinner, and the second act of the opera never retired before the midnight hour.

Although Mlle. Eloise drank sparingly of wine at the dinner which followed, the father and her noble admirers had sent her the day before half a dozen bottles of royal Amontillado—a wine to its any temperance lover. She had persuaded her into the cat-glass decanter belonging to the set in the dining-room, and had ordered it served by her purpose, she suddenly rose from the table, went into the drawing-room, and there was presented with the decanter and three glasses. To make the wine, she filled the three glasses from the contents of the decanter, and then was conversing earnestly with the guests, all scarcely noticed Alexander Harding's movements. She filled the three glasses from the royal wine, reserving to herself the one that had been poured out first.

"Now," she cried gayly, "it is time for us all to drink our health, and I am sure that I, for one, I have brought out this superb sherry, in which to drink a toast to the success of the play to-morrow!"

The father and friend, imitating the example of the fair hostess, arose to their feet, and tossed off the sparkling contents of their glasses. Then Mlle. Eloise Harding sank into her chair, her bosom first grew strangely pallid. Her father's eyes were fixed upon her face. She had suddenly risen across his mind. He rushed into the drawing-room, his friend at his heels, and found Eloise lying dead upon the floor.

"Why, what's the matter?" exclaimed Clark.

"We've come down in the dumps, and brought the fiddle, too—"

"Clear out, you fool!" Don't you know what master said?"

"Yes, Miss Addie, I only wish I could."

"That was a time, Miss Addie, when I could dance and sing,

And there wasn't a darky on the place with me could cut a pigeon wing.

My poor old wife would pat the floor, and my body's old and sore,

But I can't dance no more.

Lord bless you, Miss Addie, I only wish I could."

THE BOOTBLACK AS A TRAVELER.

A Detroit bootblack who had strayed out to Pontiac one day last week, having a dime in his hand with a benevolent old man. Of course, Shiner put down the window as soon as he saw the coin, and he was engaged for forty minutes an hour, and the old man presently said:

"Don't I want some way to jump down?"

"Don't I want some way to jump out in the care of the conductor or the baggage-man?"

Then he struck his head and shoulders out, and the old man shouted:

"Hey, why do you lean out of the window so far?"

"Don't I want to see if there are any cattle on the track?" replied Shiner.

That struck the old fellow, continued the man, as he hauled the boy in.

"Don't I want to see if a boy thirteen years old named Henry—"

"Didn't they call him Hank?" inquired the boy.

"There was a boy named Henry." One day he took a notion to put the window down and stick his head out of it, and—

BASEBALL.

CLEVELAND vs. CINCINNATI.

The sixth championship game between the Clevelands and Cincinnatis was played Sept. 8, at Cleveland, O. McGeary took Hankinson's place as third baseman of the home-team. McCormick and Will White pitched with telling effect, and but few ash hits were made. The only run of the game was scored by the Clevelands in the first inning. Jim Shaffer took second on Sky's wild throw, and Kelly's head, and came home on Hotaling's inch hit to centre. Dunlap fouled to second base, and was much applauded for a pretty one-handed catch. Jim White at right field captured a hit apparently good for three bases, and Sky made a throw "doubled-up" McGeary at first base.

The second games between these clubs took place on Sept. 7 at Cleveland, O. The one in the morning resulted in a victory for the Cincinnatis, who presented Purcell as pitcher, while Gilligan also taking the position for the Clevelands, Gilligan also taking the place of Kennedy as catcher. The Cincinnatis earned but one run, and that in the ninth inning, when Gagnier hit his safety and was sent home by Gardner's three-bagger. Errors by Smith, Jim White, Clapp and Say yielded three more runs to the home-team on three safe hits. The Cincinnatis scored three runs in the fourth on two baggers by Jim White and Smith, a single by Carpenter and a base on called balls given Clapp. Hanlon's miss yielded another tally to the visitors, and they scored the winning run in the ninth on a base on called balls given Smith, a wild pitch and Carpenter's single. Jim White's batting and Clapp's catching were the features.

In the afternoon contest the result was reversed by the visitors blanking their opponents and winning easily. McCormick and Kennedy took the places of Gardner and Gilligan, and this change, together with a costly error by Sharon, enabled the Clevelands to win. McCormick's pitching puzzled the Cincinnatis, and but two safe hits were made off him, while not one of the visitors reached first base on fielding errors. Will White took Purcell's place as pitcher for the Cincinnatis. Say's shortstopping was Boston-worthy, and was the most fantastic assists. Dunlap did the best batting for the home-team.

Another hotly contested game between the Clevelands and Cincinnatis was played at Cleveland, O., on Sept. 9. The very cold weather prevented a large attendance, and caused several errors to be made. The visitors took a slight lead at the outset, and kept it until the eighth inning, when Shoffer by during base-running secured the tally which enabled Cleveland to tie the score. In the ninth the Clevelands bunched three safe hits and scored two runs, thus winning as follows:

CHICAGO vs. BUFFALO.

The Chicagos added another to their long list of victories by defeating the Buffalos at Chicago, Sept. 4, in the eighth game of their championship series. The home-team scored four runs in the first inning, after base hits on balls on called balls. Galvin was batted hard in the sixth inning, but managed to keep him from scoring, and also from yielding five runs. Galvin and Goldsmith led in batting, for their respective sides, the first batting safely each time he went to the bat. Goldsmith was credited with the last two innings, playing a fine game, and in the seventh of these hits being made off him, and caught pooty, especially during the latter part of the game. Hankinson and Pearson were also in the game.

The games between the Chicagos and Buffalos on Sept. 7 and 8, at Buffalo, N. Y., was one of the most closely contested of the series, and resulted in an exciting contest. The weather was exceedingly small, save to the threatening aspect of the weather. Corey replaced Richardson in the home-team's nine, Stanton caught and Weldman pitched for the home-team, and Hankinson led off with a base on balls. Kelly's miss of Crowley's third strike, a three-bagger by Horning, and a wild pitch by Weldman gave Way to Weldman.

PROVIDENCE vs. WORCESTER.

The above-named clubs played the eighth championship game on Sept. 6 at Providence, R. I., in the presence of a large audience. Both nines occupied the home-team, and proved too much for the Worcesters, who were defeated. Their only run in the game was made on a fly dropped by Ward. Richmond was at his best form in the box, and after passing Farrell each put the ball over the fence for a home-run. Farrell and Ward also distinguished himself in the field, a long running catch by the latter and a fine assist-outing him to make a brilliant double-play.

WORCESTER vs. BOSTON.

The Worcesters blanked the Bostons on Sept. 8 at Boston, Mass. Cory pitched for the visitors, and was hit but once safely, and that by Jimmy O'Rourke in the second inning. The Worcesters made only three hits off Spring during the nine innings, but got onto him for five safe hits in the sixth, and one safe hit and two runs were scored off him. The Worcesters also received a number of runs on errors, Dickerson was credited with a difficult running-catch. The weather was cold and disagreeable, and interfered with the fine umpire the game, but he failed to put in an appearance, and Tom Bond officiated instead, in the absence of the Rochesters.

THE CALIFORNIA LEAGUE.

The fifth game of the new series between the Knickerbockers and Athletics took place on Sept. 4, at San Francisco, Cal., and was witnessed by a large assemblage. Both nines were somewhat unsteady absent, and C. Whitney was substituted as short-stop for the Knickerbockers. Sweeney led off for the Athletics with a clean home-run, he actually crossing the home-plate before the ball was fielded in. Six singles and a two-base hit gave the visitors in the third inning on a base on called balls given J. Dolan, and six safe hits by the Athletics in the fourth. Errors by Curran and Denny gave the Knicks three more runs on the fifth, but the Athletics equalled the score by making three earned runs in the seventh and eighth innings on Denny's batting. Dolan's home-run, a three-bagger and Boyle's single, Carey's fumble and Sweeney's muff placed two of the Knickerbockers on the bases in the ninth, after two were out, and both came home on J. Whitney's single. Denny's fine fielding was a feature. Attendance, 2,000.

AKRON vs. CHICAGO.

The Chicagos visited Akron on Sept. 8, and were there and then treated to a "surprise party" by the Akrons. Scoville was substituted as pitcher, but he proved a failure, and quickly exchanged positions with Williamson. Hague, a pitched with great success in the home-team, but two safe hits and errors off his delivery netted the visitors nine people with the defeat of the coming champions by the score of 9 to 1.

PROVIDENCE vs. TROY.

The sixth game between the above-named clubs was played on Sept. 9 at Troy, N. Y., and Ewing for Tobin and Hoobert, but the change did not strengthen the team, as expected. The fielding of both nines was good, and the pitching of both Ward and Keefe was very fine, but the Troy men were blanked for the second time this season, but one man reaching third base. The visitors' only run was a two-bagger and Honck's single, earned the only run scored.

TROY vs. THE BOTOS.

The Troys defeated the Botos on Sept. 10, in Troy, N. Y., in a humiliating manner. The Troys, although outfield played gaily, batting, knocking with Potter, did some terrible pitcher's position. Five hits and found out of the were scored off Foley in the first, earned runs when he changed with Keogh. In two innings, eight innings the latter was batted seventh and and Daniels batted in three runs. Foley and Foley pitching. The Bostons earned their two runs in the fourth and fifth innings, Sullivan and Hodnett single by John O'Rourke in the third inning a triangle by Sullivan, one of the contest was that all runs scored were earned, the errors in every in favor being retrieved by brilliant plays.

TO THE PUBLIC.
Hearing that certain unprincipled parties have circulated false reports concerning my daughters, in relation to any
INTERESTED PERSONS
THAT THE
FOUR ST. FELIX SISTERS
WERE SISTERS,
all being daughters of
MADAME G. FELIX
who has always traveled with them. Hoping that this will answer all questions that may have arisen in regard to this subject, I remain respectfully MADAME G. FELIX.

MANAGERS OF FIRST-CLASS VARIETIES
TAKE NOTICE.
I have a series of the best
SENSATIONAL DRAMAS
ON THE ROAD,
AND DON'T YOU FORGET IT!
THE HERMIT,
3 ACTS.
CHARLEY ROSS,
4 ACTS.
THE CUBAN SPY,
3 ACTS.
Are three good Dramas, with good titles—
And DON'T YOU FORGET IT!
Because I want a date with you.
What's more, I think we will brew
A potent charm at great degree,
And we'll be a crowd there, you see.
Address till Oct. 1 C. W. FOREMAN,

(COPYRIGHTED.)
EMMERSON, CLARK
AND THE
DALY BROTHERS
IN ENGLAND.
OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

A noticeable feature in the proceedings was the appearance of Emmerson, Clark and the Daly Brothers, a merry quartet designated as "America's Greatest Team of Eccentric Artists," and who certainly do not belie their title. Justify the first part of this description by leaving from the ground and kicking a hat held aloft by one of the party standing upon a chair placed upon a table, whilst the second by which they walked about on their hands, maintained each other in a played manner evidenced an inclination to warrant the final epithet to result. In this peculiar line these four performers are unanimously pronounced LONDON EXPRESS.

CANTERBURY PALACE.—The K. H. K.'s—Messrs. Emmerson, Clark and the Daly Brothers—are the latest importations from America, and, as their name implies, are decidedly eccentric. Their very clever entertainment elicited bit at the theatre. Their very clever entertainment elicited bit at the theatre. Their very clever entertainment elicited bit at the theatre
